

09/22/09 - Do something conservative

Everywhere you go people talk about how bad things are. If they aren't talking about the shrinking economy, it's the lack of morals or the ever-growing aura of big brother peeking over your shoulder. What is a person to do? As much as I hate to admit it, no one in Washington can fix the problem. Many conservatives have a tendency to think like socialists and trust the central government to fix the country's problems. Sorry, deliverance will not come from Babylon. Which again begs the question, what are we supposed to do? How about, instead of waiting on Washington to change, citizens do something conservative? I can't light up the world, but I can brighten the corner I live in. If people would put action to the principles they say they believe in, the country would be transformed, piece by piece. Call it conservatism in action.

One place to start is turning off the television. That may sound unnecessary, but what better way to conserve your family than by cutting off the toxic wasteline from Hollywood into your home. It is amazing how much you can get done with the television off and a goal in mind. As small as it sounds, turning off the television is a conservative action that would benefit individuals and families everywhere.
